SPEAKER BIO

Jeff started thinking about becoming a lawyer when he was still in high school. An uncle had just started in the profession and it seemed a good respectful calling. When entering university, he first studied history and political science, but hoped he was headed to law school.

As the son of an electrical contractor in the northern part of the Province, Jeff had also always had an interest in the field of construction. This interest led him to taking the construction law class in law school and to continuing his learning in the field as he began his practice. He became involved with the construction industry early on in his career, becoming a member and participating in the activities of both the Moncton Northeast Construction Association and the Construction Association of New Brunswick. Jeff devotes most of his practice to this very technical and challenging field and has given many presentations and seminars on the subject, both to business owners involved in the industry and to lawyers as well. He soon realized that many lawyers preferred to simply refer their clients with issues of this nature to someone such as himself who had construction law experience.

Presentation Summary:

In response to the continuously changing construction industry, several Canadian Provinces such as Ontario and Nova Scotia have updated their construction law legislation to be more responsive to modern construction law issues. The major changes being considered are the addition of prompt payment, expedited resolution and revamping of the Mechanics Lien Act.
