The Orange Riots

July 11 & 12, 1871

In an attempt to commemorate the 1690 victory of William of Orange, the new Protestant King of England, the Loyal Order of Orange requested a parade permit from the City of New York. The city's largely Irish Catholic population and its associations including the AOH lodged a formal protest in order to halt the parade citing the past practice of the Irish Protestant marchers taunting the Catholics. Supported initially by William "Boss" Tweed, New York City Police Commissioner James Kelso agreed, and the parade permit was denied on the grounds that it would threaten the public safety.
Irish Catholics including Archbishop John McCloskey applauded the decision. The Orangemen protested demanding equal treatment with the Catholics. Governor John Hoffman, a Tammany man himself, interjected and with the swing support of Boss Tweed, the decision was reversed, and the parade allowed to proceed as planned.

The Governor ordered 5,000 members of the National Guard as well as the police department to safeguard the marchers and keep public order. The powder keg was lit and a now famous riot would ensue. The parade began on Eight Avenue and 29th street at 2 in the afternoon. Cheers from the Protestants clashed with the angry jeers from the Catholics.
The crowd began to pelt the paraders with stones, bricks, bottles, and shoes. Irish confetti as it was called. National Guardsmen and the Police alike responded with musket and rifle fire as they took aim indiscriminately at the crowd.
But the crowd did not disperse and responded with more Irish confetti and pistol shots. Rocks and crockery pelted down from roof tops as the parade made its way to 23rd street. The parade would eventually cross over to 5th

Avenue and disperse near Cooper Union. When it was all over, the riot caused the death of over 60 civilians, mostly Irish Catholic Laborers, and 3 National Guardsmen. Over 150 people were wounded and over 100 arrested. The Irish Catholic population began to call the riot the "Slaughter on 8th Ave" as they hung Governor Hoffman in effigy.

The impact of The Orange Riots was significant. The famous cartoonist Thomas Nast would unfortunately depict the Irish as a stereotypical enraged mob charging a single unarmed Irish Protestant. Nast, not known to embellish such political cartoons with reputed inaccuracy might have been influenced by his presence at the parade. He was a National Guardsman in the famous 7th Regiment and had personal experience with the Irish protest of the parade. The driving force in the decision to allow the parade had nothing to do with religion. Politicians of the day began to look with fear at the growing political power of the Irish Catholics and the connections with Fenianism and Irish Nationalism. But the decision to allow the parade backfired. In addition to the deaths of over 60 civilians, Tammany Hall and Boss Tweed would lose favor with the Irish immigrant population. Loss of votes and becoming the target of Thomas Nast's cartoons in Harpers Weekly, Tweed and Tammany hall would begin its decline. Falling from power shortly after the Orange Riots, Boss Tweed would fade as a prominent force in New York City. The Irish however would continue to rise as a powerful, and, peaceful presence in the city. Many becoming members of the Police and Fire departments, the Irish of New York would eventually dismiss the stereotypical label that was unfortunately displayed by their actions during the Orange Riots. But as Congregationalist preacher Richardson put it, "we need to take back New York City for if the higher class will not govern, the lower classes will". It is at this point in history we see the rise of the gilded age and the extreme wealth of the likes of Commodore Vanderbilt and John D. Rockefeller.

Sláinte,
Neil
